"Mallory" Bacteria Named

A lab in Israel has named a disease-fighting bacteriophage after 2010 Beverly High graduate Mallory Smith, who lost her long battle with Cystic Fibrosis in 2017.

The phage match for Mallory's bacteria, aptly titled BC-Mallory1, effectively kills several burkolderia cepacia strains including the ones isolated from her infection.

Mallory's mother Diane Shader Smith connected with Dr. Ronen Hazan of the Israeli lab through epidemiologist Steffanie Strathdee, a long-time advocate for phage therapy and author of the postscript for Mallory's memoir, "Salt in my Soul: An Unfinished Life."

Although Mallory didn't make it, her case is the first of its kind to have shown efficacy.

"It's bittersweet, because it should have saved Mallory but we didn't get it in time," said Shader Smith of the phage match. "That's really hard to accept. But now that Mallory is gone, it is comforting to know that her life and her death is saving other lives."

Smith calls this development "promising," and highlights the importance of the reignited interest in phage therapy as an option for treating superbugs.
